

Stirrings against sex trafficking

When Jeremy Jackson first read about sex trafficking last summer, he couldn't believe he'd heard so little about it. The McGill student decided to gather as much information and as many allies as possible to shed light on what the Council of Europe calls the "third largest illicit money-making venture in the world," after weapons and drugs.

Jackson says the idea to get involved against sex trafficking started with his church group, but he's also looking to student chapters of Amnesty International and OXFAM at Concordia and McGill to rally around the cause of sex trafficking and help organize activities to raise awareness. This week, the documentary Not for Sale will be screened, and in January, local hip hop group Nomadic Massive will play Justice Jam, a benefit concert to raise money for International Justice Mission (IJM), an organization that works to ensure "public justice systems work for the poor."

"They influence the entire system," Jackson says of IJM. "They advocate [on behalf of] people who aren't protected by the law."

Not for Sale will be screened at Java U (corner Sherbrooke and Union) on Nov. 16 at 9 p.m. Check www.justicejam.ca for more details.

by Tracey Lindeman